galerie s: t petri s:t petri kyrkogata 5 PAUL KIRALY - skulptör 18 februari - 8 mars 1972 " Det kan tyckas, att vårt århundrade vida överskrider föregångarnas bildkonstproduktion - kvantitativt; utbudet av bilder är enormt. Det är en närmast hopplös uppgift i dagens konstliv, att väcka något gensvar hos den mättade publiken; bildkonsten har i många fall blivit ett mesopotamiskt språk för de oinitierade. Men att därav dra slutsatsen, att den föreställande bilden är den enda och sanna konstformen, tillgänglig och begriplig för alla, kan nog vara en grövre sortens misstag. I det läge där en stark likgiltighet för all form av konst råder, finns krafter som ser sina möjligheter, behärskar tyckandet via massmedia, ofta ser till att ett visst politiskt budskap kommer fram genom omsorgsfullt byggda kanaler. Riktningen är inte svår att ta miste på; den vanlige iakttagaren kan och bör inte sällan kunna få en tankeställare. Problematik: Form: -Vad är förutsättningen för däggdjurets svällande form? -Kan något liknande däggdjurets form åstadkommas av plasma, dvs. fast materia + vätska? -Har färgen någon roll i sammanhanget? Lius: -Kan det primära ljuset påverka däggdjuret känslomässigt?

-Ar ljuset av fysisk natur?"

Gallery S:t Petri S:t Petri Church Street 5, Lund PAUL KIRALY - Sculptor February 18 - March 8, 1972

"It may seem that our century is vastly surpassing the production of visual art in terms of quantity; the supply of images is enormous. It is a nearly hopeless task in today's art world to evoke any response from the jaded audience; visual art has, in many cases, become a Mesopotamian language for the uninitiated.

However, to then conclude that the representational image is the only true form of art, accessible and understandable to all, could indeed be a gross mistake.

In an environment where a strong indifference towards all forms of art prevails, there are forces that seize their opportunities, mastering opinion through mass media, often ensuring that a certain political message comes through via carefully constructed channels. The direction is not hard to miss; the average observer can and should often find themselves provoked to thought.

Issues:

Form:

- What is the basis for the mammal's swelling form?
- Can something similar to the mammal's form be achieved with plasma, i.e., solid matter + liquid?
- Does color play any role in this context?

Light:

- Can primary light affect the mammal emotionally?
- Is the light of a physical nature?"

It should make the observer feel that what he is seeing contains within its own organic, radient energy . It must live and, it must fructify . This exhibition of miniaturised monuments shows my attempts to clinically concretize the abundance of beingness in a socially understandable way ."

Form and Light at Gallery S:t Petri

This time, the exhibitor at Gallery S:t Petri in Lund is the sculptor Paul Kiraly. His exhibition is said to reflect that "It can be said that our century has overemphasized the art of images in relation to the art of form." In connection with his production, the quantitative aspect of image-based art is significant. The supply of images is enormous. It is an almost utopian task in today's art climate to generate any kind of reaction from the media or the audience. Image-based art has in many ways become almost anesthetized — numbed in its sensitivity. But from this situation, the consequence arises that the presented image is the only one accessible, a form that is accessible and understandable to everyone, and can even be a sort of "lowest common denominator."

And here, Paul Kiraly presents form and light in a cohesive composition with a soft, aesthetic line. He has divided his work into various studies of nature's shapes and is continuously developing this phenomenon. The exhibition runs until March 8 with free entry.
